(A) The Execution of Kurt Steiner

--- Neil Chapman

scene 10 An aerial positioned on the bungalow's roof is the older of two devices. More recently, to extend the range of broadcasting operations, a new aerial has been erected within the bungalow's fenced enclosure. Its main upright portion is a 'box' structure in anodised steel bolted to concrete foundations. Cables tied to four outlying foundations protect it from strong winds. For the aerial to be installed a portion of the perimeter fence had to be taken down. A temporary road surface was laid but the contractors' vehicles churned up the turf all the same, making the corner of the enclosure into a muddy building site. Above the slim structure two rods extend from a cream-coloured housing. One is longer than the other. At its tip is a more slender rod still that flexes in the wind. A red light on the housing indicates broadcast operations in progress.
