(A) The Execution of Kurt Steiner

--- Neil Chapman

scene 13 An odd brightness is visible in rings that show each exhaust. It's odd to see a brightness in the sky at midday which is not the sun. The two bright rings are matched by intense and directional sound, not loud – at least not yet. You can hear the peculiarity that tells what's coming. Look at the portion of sky through which the aircraft has just flown. There loudness is located. When the plane banks, when for a moment your standing position on the railway platform corresponds with its forward vector, at that moment the sound will achieve its magnitude. It will shatter the peace that reigned over farm lands and you will be struck again by the complicity that must exist between the Air Force base and the town nearby from which it takes its name.
